THE MAJOR'S DUEL.

The flagship Martingale, of the South Atlantic squadron, was moored in the beautiful harbor of Rio Janeiro. The flag of Rear Admiral Sansompost flew from the mizzen truck. The war between Brazil and Paraguay was progressing slowly, but as it affected many interests of foreigners domiciled in both countries, a large number of warships were on the South American coast, and the metropolis of Brazil was gay with uniforms and the constant festivities consequent upon the presence of so many strangers. The days of dueling were past. The larger courtesy consequent upon better education, and a more careful regard > over. The band had ceased its evening concert and had been dismissed. The charming strains of the old time "tattoo" with fifes and drums had died away. "Two bells" had been struck, and the boatswain and his mates had "piped down." Lights had been reported out, and a perfect stillness succeeded the stir made by 400 men, who had retired to their hammocks.

> "Boat ahoy!" sang out the quartermaster. "Boat coming alongside, sir; can't make out the answer." The messenger boy with a lantern flew over the gangway and down the ladder, and soon a brisk, dapper little man came on board and presented himself to the officer of the deck with a graceful salute. "Sir," said he, "permit me to intro-

Captain Tompion had eaten an excellent dinner. The better part of three bottles of claret had disappeared down his throat, and he was at peace with all the world. He belonged to the fighting men of the "old navy," and any hint of experimented with was that which is used a fight was music to his ears. To him in making the large Caveur cigar, much appeared the officer of the deck, with

"Sir," said he, "I have great pleasure in introducing to you Baron Knockoff, of the Russian diplomatic service. He has had a personal difficulty with a Brazilian on shore, and as there are no Russian officers here he has come on board to ask one of ours to act as his second. I have assured him of our sympathy and assistance, and he desires to consult with you and await the return of Major Randall, who is on shore."

Bless my soul, this seems like old times, indeed! Stand by you? Of course, we will, my boy. Have another glass of wine. Steward, cigars."

Lieutenant Lawrence, the first heutenant, came up the hatch-tall, stern, erect as a soldier-and passed into the cabin. The popping of corks ensued, and the conference began.

The officer of the deck caught a stray messmate and sent him to the wardroom with the story, and soon an interested group gathered on the quarter deck. eagerly awaiting developments.

"Such punishment as a court martial may adjudge may be inflicted on any person in the navy who sends or accepts a challenge to fight a duel or acts as a second in a duel."

This is the language of the articles of war which were framed to regulate the saw no cause. conduct of these gallant officers who were aiding and abetting the baren. The officer of the deck was summoned to the conference. During the continued use of champagne it was determined that it was a solenin moral duty to stand by the baron, and another bottle was opened. Still the missing major came not. Time | up and said: was passing. Something must be done, so Lieutenant McKillen was sent for. After being introduced to the baron at stake and that he would have the high privilege of acting as the baron's when, just at this juncture, Major Randall came on board. With a flower in his buttonhole, his coat thrown back from his ample chest amming a popular air from the "Grand Duchess" and apparently at peace with all the world, the gallant fleet marine officer stepped from the outer darkness upon the quarter deck. He was probably the most peaceful warrior in the world at that time. Correct in habits, mild and gentle in demeanor, with a profound respect for regulations and a great care not to break them, he seemed to be the last person in the world to assist in a

Upon him pounced the officer of the

"Major," said he, "prepare your mind for something very serious. You will require all your fortitude for a painful and trying duty; one that you must perform for the honor and credit of the flag and of the uniform you wear," and before the astonished soldier could utter a word the deck officer rushed him into the "Oh, major, you are just in time. You have just come very near to losing a chance to distinguish yourself in a serious matter. Have a glass of wine." So spoke Captain Tompion, while the baron shook him effusively by the hand. The matter in question was explained to the major, while the captain and the first lieutenant impressed upon him his duty in the case. Lieutenant McKillen, who was now out of the fight, took great pleasure in helping the major with friendly advice, while the steward opened another bottle of champagne.

What passed through the pacific mind of the soldier no one knew at that time. If he mentally beheld a vision of a gory field of battle, with one or possibly both combatants stretched upon the grass wounded or dead, if he thought of his own arrest and trial before a court martial, he gave no sign of his feelings. On the contrary, like one waking from a sleep, he suddenly exclaimed, "Baron, I will act for you in this case with much pleasure. I am quite at your service,' and after each had shaken him solemnly by the hand, they all took a drink.

It was getting late. The major, saying nothing to any one, carefully arrayed himself in his best uniform cost, and accompanied the baron on shore. The next morning an intense but quiet excitement pervaded the after part of the ship. In low voices the officers discussed the matter in all its bearings. Had the duel come off and the major secreted himself until he could evade the authorities on shore and escape to the ship? Had the combatants gone a long distance into the country and not yet returned? Such queries were discussed pro and con, and still no major came. Breakfast passed. Quarters, and no major. Lunch, and he was still absent. Every boat was scanned for a sight of his stalwart form and genial face. At last it was resolved to send a delegation on shore to look him up, when, just as they were about to start, a boat came alongside, and the major stepped on deck.

His countenance was solemn, almost stolid in its expression. His coat was buttoned up awry and was unbrushed. His usually resplendent shoes were un-polished, but drawing his form to its full height he saluted the officer of the deck in a military manner and deliberately said, "Sir, I have returned aboard," Making a half face to the left he proceeded to the hatch and carefully went

His expectant messmates were in the wardroom in force to hear the news. Whether he was the bearer of tragio words or whether of cheerful ones was the question. The hero seated himself

After a moment of silence the major spoke as follows: "If any of you fellows want to fight a duel, call on me to act want to fight a duel, call on me to act want to fight a duel, call on me to act want to fight a duel, call on me to act want to fight a duel, call on me to act want to fight a duel, call on me to act way. "Messmates," he began, "judging from my dilapidated appearance and my somewhat interrupted speech, you may imagine that I am the victim of grief, or of a hurried flight from a tragic scene. I beg to assure you that it is not so. There is nothing the matter with me but conviviality, and that of the strangest kind. I hereby renew my offer to act as a second in any further duels that may come our way," and the major leaned back in his chair and patted his swelling breast approvingly. "I need not tell you, gentlemen, that when I started ashore last night with the baron I could not see my way out of what promised to be a very serious scrape. After reaching the baron's room, over a bottle of champagne, he gave me his case. It seems that at a ball the previous evening the Brazilian gentleman spoken of by the baron had given him offense by something that he had said, and the baron was determined to demand satisfaction. He was ready to fight at daylight with either sword or pistol. 1 at once demanded that my principal should put himself unreservedly into my hands, and he governed by any arrangements that I should make. Fortunately I knew the Brazilian well, and as the baron insisted on baste in the matter, I proceeded at once on my mission, although it was after midnight. "I assumed a severe expression of countenance, and summoned the Brazilian to a conference from his bed. He received me very courteously, but expressed some surprise at so late a call. "I said, 'My dear sir, you have given great offense to my friend, Baron Knockoff, and he has desired me to demand satisfaction of you."

"The gentleman was greatly surprised, and said that he knew the baron very well, and regarded him as one of his friends, and was utterly unconscious of giving him offense at the time mentioned, and that the haron was mistaken He said that he had no desire to fight without cause, and that in this case be

"After some talk he said he did not know where to look for a second at that time of the night, and at last he asked my advice in the matter.

'You are a military man,' said he, 'and are accustomed to these affairs. What do you advise?

"I answered that I thought that if he would write a note to the baron disclaiming any intention of giving offense I could arrange the matter. He said: 'That would look like an apology. I won't apologize to any man that hanls me out of bed like this. I would rather fight him.' "I hastened to assure him that he had

"'My dear fellow,' said the baron, 'don't be offended; let us talk this matter over.' He read the note again, and after some conversation he asked, 'Major, you are a military man; if you were in my place would you accept this note? "I can again assure you, brethren, that I spoke with much feeling when I answered, 'I certainly would. " 'Then I will accept it,' said the baron. We will go and get the gentleman up, and shake hands over a bottle of wine. "We did so, and have been shaking hands in the same condition ever since. "So, gentlemen, bring all your duels to me. I will be your second," said the

It was at once voted that for bravery and diplomacy the major took the prize. -Commodore Rockwell, U. S. N., in Harper's Weekly.

A Good Rule. Semioccasionally one hears the details of the life of this man or that woman who has lived to be eighty-five or ninety years old, his or her habits being stated as illustrations of what it is neces sary for a person to do to live long. I I believe there are nearly as many methods of reaching an active, comfortable old age as there are persons, and that what will serve one person will injure the other one. There is one rule, however, which if followed will I believe help all persons to live to an advanced age. Believe that life is worth living, like to live and avoid worrying about anything. Doing this one cannot conscientiously abuse his or her stomach
